Plant Parents – What Are They?

Once considered old fashioned, houseplants are now making a comeback in popularity. Caring for houseplants gives us all a sense of purpose, especially Millennials, who are taking care of these plants as if they were their children.

The New York Times says wellness-minded Millennials are filling a void – both decorative and emotional – with houseplants.

Millennial plant parents have taken to social media, creating virtual communities including #thejungalow and #houseplantclub and starting online classes such as Homestead Brooklyn's Plant One on Me, to help encourage each other to jump into plant care.

Plus, the shared information helps keep their plant babies alive and well!

Our houseplant experts are always available to answer all your questions and provide tips and tricks on houseplant care.

Exploring the Soaring Popularity of Plant Swaps

In the heart of the urban jungle, a delightful trend has taken root – plant swaps! These gatherings of plant enthusiasts have rapidly gained momentum, and it's no wonder why. The allure of this activity of giving lies in a unique blend of community, sustainability, and the joy of nurturing nature.

Plant swaps are a fun group activity

They help to foster a sense of camaraderie among participants. Sharing tips, anecdotes, and even failures, attendees create connections that transcend the boundaries of age, background, or expertise. As the saying goes, "A plant shared is a friend made," and these swaps truly exemplify this spirit.

My Journey as a Plant Parent

In the bustling chaos of modern life, we often find ourselves preoccupied with our own pursuits and ambitions, unintentionally oblivious to the intricate tapestry of life that surrounds us. From the vibrant blooms in a neighborhood garden to the mysterious creatures that inhabit the depths of a forest, we, as human beings, frequently overlook the silent but profound existence of the natural world. It was amidst this backdrop of indifference that I stumbled upon a transformational journey, one that would not only awaken my senses to the beauty of nature but also teach me invaluable lessons in responsibility, attentiveness, and emotional well-being. This is the story of how I have blossomed into a responsible person through my journey as a plant parent.
